ABSTRACT

This volume consists of an index of questions repeated in public opinion surveys, and the variants of these questions. The questions included are drawn from American national samples (primarily of the general population) conducted by AIPO (Gallup) NORC, and Roper, and archived at the Roper Public Opinion Research Center. The basic data for over 90 percent of the surveys cited are available only from the Roper Center. The earliest survey included in this index was undertaken in September, 1936, and the most recent survey in October, 1973. The purpose of the index is to make accessible a data base for the measurement and analysis of social change. Seventy major topics comprised of specific research questions range from agricultural farm income trends to Americans' attitudes toward Yugoslavia. Each entry consists of the question wording, the survey organization which asked the question, the number and date of the survey, and the number of the question. As an aid to researchers undertaking secondary analysis of survey data, Norval D. Glenn has written a guide to survey archive research. Also included are a list of publications on the study of social change using survey data from the Roper Center; a summary of the procedures used in compiling the index; and information on code categories for demographic background question and changes in survey sampling procedures. INTRODUCTION

This book is an index to all questions asked in two or more years in the American national survey holdings of the Roper Public Opinion Research Center. It is the first product of a two-stage pilot project on social indicators from survey archives, sponsored by the Social Science Research Council's Center for Coordination of Research on Social Indicators, and funded by Russell Sage Foundation.

The second stage of the project is designed to test the usefulness of this index for the development of social indicators. The SSRC Center for Social Indicators will (1) receive and review applications from investigators who wish to use specific data sets cited in this index; (2) select from among them a few innovative proposals; (3) use the limited funds set aside for the purpose to compensate the Roper Center for cleaning and making duplicates of the requested data available, under its standard rediffusion procedures, for the research projects which are selected. The project funds are only for cleaning the data and making duplicates of them available; the Center for Social Indicators does not have funds to support any other aspects of the proposed studies. Until the end of 1976, data sets which have been cleaned with Russell Sage Foundation-Social Science Research Council funds under this agreement between SSRC and the Roper Center will be available from the Roper Center at the lowest price it charges for the reproduction of cleaned data sets. For a list of the data sets which have been cleaned under this program, please contact the SSRC Center for Social Indicators.

Researchers interested in this program should write to the SSRC Center for Social Indicators, 1755 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. The application, which may take the form of a letter, will be screened by SSRC's Advisory and Planning Committee on Social Indicators, with the aid of _ad hoc_ consultants as necessary. The application should include the following information:

1. starting date of the project
2. surveys requested
3. abstract of the proposed research
    a. purpose of the research
    b. topics to be covered
    c. plan of analysis
4. plans for publication or other dissemination of the research findings
5. resumes of the principal investigators

Graduate students are requested to supply the name(s) of their sponsors and/or doctoral committee.

Applicants are advised to familiarize themselves with the surveys they propose to use - to ensure that they will be able to obtain sufficient information on their topic of primary interest, as well as information on related secondary topics. For some of the questions listed in this index, information on marginal distributions of responses may be found in the monthly _Gallup Opinion Index_ (formerly the _Gallup Political Index_), the three-volume work by George H. Gallup, _The Gallup Poll: Public Opinion 1935-1972_ (New York: Random House, 1972), "The Polls" section of _Public Opinion Quarterly_ (see Appendix D), and _Current Opinion_, a monthly newsletter published by the Roper Center. In other cases this information can be obtained from the Roper Public Opinion Research Center (see section below on Roper Center services).

In undertaking the research application phase of this project, the Committee hopes to encourage the use of this index for research on recent social trends in the United States, and the development of analytical techniques for measuring and understanding these trends. In screening applications for this program, the Committee will be particularly interested in innovative proposals which demonstrate a degree of methodological sophistication and which evince a commitment to dissemination of research findings either through scholarly publications, conferences, new academic courses, or other mechanisms by which the usual time lag between research and communicated results can be shortened.

This Book

One of the principal objectives of the SSRC Center for Social Indicators is to find ways to improve the data base for the measurement and analysis of social change. This search has led to a number of activities, one of the most promising of which is the present project on social indicators from survey archives. There exist today extensive archives of past survey data, the potential usefulness of which for comparative and over-time studies has long been recognized. Among these, the Roper Public Opinion Research Center is by far the largest. However, in view of the scope of the Roper Center's holdings - in size, geographical coverage, and time depth - it is clear that their research potential has not yet been fully exploited. Recognizing the potential of these holdings for the development of a broad range of indicators of social change, the Roper Center and the SSRC Center for Social Indicators have collaborated to produce the present book.

The bulk of this volume consists of an index to repeated questions in the American national surveys housed in the Roper Center's archives. Each entry consists of the question wording, the survey organization which asked the question, the number and date of the survey, and the number of the question. The same information is provided for variant wordings of the question. In short, the index provides sufficient information to permit quick identification of survey data items likely to be useful in constructing time series.

Several additional kinds of information are provided in this book, both to supplement the index and to encourage its use. First, as an aid to researchers undertaking secondary analysis of survey data, Professor Norval D. Glenn has written a short guide to survey archive research. Following his essay is a supplementary list of publications on the study of social change using survey data. Second, the background and current services of the Roper Center are described; this section includes the information necessary for researchers wishing to obtain materials listed in this index. Third, the Associate Editor has provided a summary of the procedures used in compiling the index. Fourth, following the index proper are three appendices (organized by research organizations) which describe the sample designs and list the code categories used for certain basic "demographic" background questions in the surveys cited in the index. And finally, information to help researchers locate marginal distributions of responses to questions listed in this index is provided in Appendix D, including a guide to subjects treated in "The Polls" section of Public Opinion Quarterly.

Acknowledgements

The Advisory and Planning Committee on Social Indicators and the staff of the Social Science Research Council's Center for Coordination of Research on Social Indicators gratefully acknowledge the interest and support of Russell Sage Foundation for this pilot project. We thank Norval D. Glenn for preparing material to aid users of this catalog. We commend the work of the Roper Public Opinion Research Center's staff, in particular, that of Professor Philip K. Hastings, Director of the Roper Center, and Jessie C. Southwick, Associate Editor of the index. We acknowledge with thanks the contributions of James A. Davis in getting us started on this project, and of Roxann A. Van Dusen in overseeing its implementation.

In a book that contains thousands of citations, errors are likely to occur. The SSRC Center for Social Indicators invites readers to bring printing and other errors to our attention, and welcomes comments on the usefulness of this book.

Center for Social Indicators

The Center for Coordination of Research on Social Indicators was established in September 1972 by the Social Science Research Council, under a grant from the Division of Social Sciences, National Science Foundation (grant no. GS-41704X). The Center's purpose is to enhance the contribution of social science research to the development of a broad range of indicators of social change, in response to current and anticipated demands from both research and policy communities. The Center is staffed by a small group of social scientists and guided by the Council's Advisory and Planning Committee on Social Indicators.

TREND STUDIES WITH AVAILABLE SURVEY DATA: OPPORTUNITIES AND PITFALLS*

By Norval D. Glenn
University of Texas at Austin

To social scientists interested in social and cultural change, in recent history, and in establishing baselines for "social indicators," the survey data on file at the Roper Public Opinion Research Center are an invaluable resource. The Center, the world's largest survey data archive, contains the data from most of the early surveys conducted by the pioneer "scientific" opinion pollsters, such as Gallup and Roper, as well as data from early surveys conducted by such nonprofit, academic survey organizations as the National Opinion Research Center (first at the University of Denver and then at the University of Chicago) and the Bureau of Applied Social Research at Columbia University. With the accumulation at the Roper Center of national survey data gathered over a period of almost four decades, there are now unprecedented opportunities for the study of trends in the values, beliefs, attitudes, knowledge, and affective states of the American people.

* I am indebted to Philip E. Converse, James A. Davis, Stephen E. Fienberg, Otis Dudley Duncan, Albert J. Reiss, Jr., and Robert Parke for helpful suggestions and to Converse, Davis and Fienberg for a critical reading of an earlier draft. Some of Converse's comments are incorporated almost verbatim (with his permission) into this version of the essay. Some of the illustrative data presented here are from research with Roper Center data financed by a grant from the National Science Foundation.

As I have pointed out elsewhere (Glenn, 1973), use in research of the Roper Center data has not been commensurate with their potential value. Although the most unique potential of the data is for trend studies, few such studies have been conducted.[1] One reason for the underutilization of the Roper Center data has been that many social scientists have not known of the archive or have been unaware of the volume and variety of the data there. It has been difficult for researchers to find out just what data of interest to them are at the Center--a problem which this index is designed to help overcome. Furthermore, persons who have considered doing trend studies with the Roper Center data may often have been deterred by fears about the quality of the earlier data and by the lack of guidance in methodology textbooks (and in other readily available sources) regarding the procedures appropriate for using early survey data in trend studies.

The purpose of this essay is to encourage use of the earlier national survey data in trend studies, but to encourage their use with appropriate caution and sensitivity to their limitations and with maximum efforts to achieve comparability with later data. I must necessarily dwell on the several pitfalls of this kind of research, and in so doing I risk conveying the impression that it is an unusually difficult kind of social research which can only yield findings worthy of an unusually low degree of confidence. Such an impression would be false. Whereas trend studies with available survey data do pose some unique problems, those problems are not uniquely refractory. As any experienced and competent social researcher knows, there is no easy social research, and virtually all social scientific findings must be viewed with a certain amount of tentativeness. In spite of their several limitations, available trend data from national surveys can be at least a valuable supplement to the many impressions and informal observations of social, cultural, psychological, and political trends in American society during the past four decades.

I organize my discussion around the major problems of trend studies with archival survey data, but in discussing and illustrating strategies for dealing with these problems, I hope to make the reader aware of the many opportunities for significant research with the data covered by this index.

Problems of Comparability Posed by Changes in Sample Design

Until the early 1950's, all of the commercial polling organizations, as well as some nonprofit survey organizations such as the National Opinion Research Center, drew their samples by the "quota control" method (see Stephan and McCarthy, 1958: 37-38). All "quota" samples are not alike, but they have in common the fact that they contain pre-determined proportions of people from certain segments of the population. For instance, it may be determined that individuals in the sample will be distributed by sex, age, region, and size of community in the same manner that the entire adult population was distributed according to the most recent decennial census. Or, if several years have elapsed since the census, estimates (usually extrapolations from census data) of the distribution of the adult population on the quota control variables may be used. Assuming that the estimates are accurate, or nearly so, a quota sample designed to represent the total adult population is necessarily representative with respect to each of the variables selected for quota controls.[2] Unfortunately, however, some early national quota samples may have been distinctly unrepresentative with respect to certain variables not subject to the controls. For instance, when "status" variables, such as occupation and amount of formal education, were not precisely controlled by the quotas, persons in the lower social levels were almost always underrepresented. Such systematic bias was introduced primarily in the final stage of the sampling process, in which interviewers strategically located across the country selected respondents to be interviewed. Each interviewer was assigned a quota of persons with specified characteristics (e.g., a certain number of males, a certain number of whites, etc.) to interview. Within the limits of the quota, the interviewer had complete discretion in the selection of respondents, and it was primarily this discretion which biased the samples. Understandably, the interviewers tended to select the more accessible of the potential respondents, who may have differed systematically from the less accessible, rarely-at-home persons in many of the attitudes studied by the surveys. Apparently it was a tendency for the interviewers to prefer to work in the safer and more pleasant neighborhoods which largely accounted for the underrepresentation of low-status persons.

Many of the samples drawn by the polling organizations in the 1930's and 1940's were deliberately designed to underrepresent certain segments of the adult population. For instance, since the earlier Gallup polls were used primarily to predict the outcome of elections and to provide readings on the sentiments of the electorate between elections, the samples were designed to represent each population segment in proportion to the votes it usually cast in elections rather than in proportion to the number of individuals in it. Since voter turnout was relatively low among females, southerners, blacks, and persons with little education, those segments of the population were deliberately underrepresented, and there were no southern blacks in many of the earlier samples.*

The most important changes to occur in the Gallup samples were those designed to make them represent the entire adult (age 21 and older) noninstitutionalized civilian population rather than voters only. As can be seen from Table 1, these changes did not occur at once but rather were spread through a period of nearly a decade. The first Gallup omnibus survey to use a sample with proportional representation of females apparently was AIPO 335, conducted in November of 1944, whereas the first omnibus survey to use a sample with proportional representation of southerners apparently was AIPO 513, conducted in March and April of 1953.[3]

By the mid-1950's, all of the major survey organizations were designing their usual samples to represent the total adult noninstitutionalized civilian population and had changed from quota control to "modified probability" samples. The latter usually follow a multistage, cluster design in which the sampling is random except in the final stage.[4] That is, the nation is divided into regions following boundaries used by the Census so that the best possible estimates of population for each region are obtained. Within each region, a limited set of narrower geographic areas is chosen randomly with probabilities proportionate to their population size. These areas, called primary sampling units (PSUs), are usually Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas or, in less populous parts of the country, counties. They are typically small enough to be covered by one team of interviewers without the interviewers spending nights away from home.

*Appendices A-C describe the sample designs employed at various times by the survey organizations most frequently cited in this index.

Since repetition of these first stages of the sampling process for each survey would require continual recruiting and training of interviewers in new areas and thus would be prohibitively expensive, the same PSUs are used for a large number of consecutive surveys. PSUs may be replaced a few at a time at regular intervals, so that it takes a decade or longer for all to be replaced, or all may be replaced at once but at wide time intervals. The territory within each PSU is divided into small areal units, usually city blocks and segments of countryside containing about the same number of residents as the typical city block. A random sample of these units is drawn for each survey, and then a number of respondents (usually from three to twelve) is selected within each block or segment. Sample households and even specific respondents within them can be selected randomly, but this procedure is rarely followed since several "callbacks" may often be necessary to find some of the randomly designated respondents at home and able to give an interview. Callbacks are expensive, and they are inconsistent with the need of opinion pollsters, who often deal with rapidly changing opinions and feelings, to complete the interviews for each survey within four to six days. Therefore, respondents within blocks and segments are usually selected by a quota method, which differs from older quota methods in that the interviewer must follow a strict set of rules in selecting respondents and is allowed no discretion.

Nevertheless, modified probability samples share with the older quota samples a tendency to underrepresent persons who are rarely at home during the hours when the interviewers call. Some survey organizations have used a weighting procedure to compensate for the underrepresentation of rarely-at-home persons. For instance, the Roper Center data decks for Gallup surveys conducted from 1960 until the late 1960's typically contain more than twice as many cards (up to four for some respondents) as there are respondents in the sample.

In sampling terminology, "cluster" may refer to the people in any areal unit selected through multistage sampling, whether that unit be a PSU, a block or segment, or a dwelling unit (if more than one person in a dwelling unit is interviewed). Unless otherwise specified, however, the term usually refers to the people in a city block or a rural segment. Therefore, there are usually from three to twelve respondents from each cluster.

At this point, the reader may feel that the changes in sample design since the pioneer surveys pose almost insurmountable problems for trend studies which span the period in which the major changes occurred. In fact, however, the changes probably had little effect on the response percentages for most of the repeated questions listed in this index. For instance, the underrepresentation of blacks, females, southerners, and low-education persons in the early Gallup samples is relatively unimportant if the responses to a question were not highly correlated with race, sex, region, or education; and contrary to widespread belief among social scientists, none of these demographic variables typically explains much of the variance in responses to attitudinal questions. If the responses to a question are highly correlated with one or more of the demographic variables on which the earlier samples are biased, there is a simple technique of standardization, comparable in its effects to the weighting procedures used by survey organizations, to compensate for the bias. In the case of regional bias, for instance, the responses of persons in the sample from different regions are standardized to a correct, or approximately correct, regional distribution to estimate what the response distribution of the entire sample would have been if the regions had been correctly represented.[5]

To illustrate, assume that ten percent of the respondents to a national survey are southerners and 90 percent are nonsoutherners, whereas the correct percentages are 25 and 75. Assume also that 30 percent of the southerners and 70 percent of the nonsoutherners gave a "yes" response to an attitude question. The unstandardized percentage of "yes" responses to this case is 66, and the standardized percentage is arrived at by multiplying 30 by 25, by multiplying 70 by 75, by summing the two products, and by dividing the sum by 100, which yields a "corrected" percentage of 60.

If necessary, bias on two or more variables can be "corrected" simultaneously. For a simple illustration, assume the following hypothetical characteristics of four regional-sex categories:

	A Distribution of Sample (in percent)	B Distribution of Adult Population (in percent)	C Percent of "Yes" Responses to an Attitude Question
Southern Males	7	15	85
Southern Females	3	15	90
Nonsouthern Males	60	35	45
Nonsouthern Females	30	35	50
	100	100

The uncorrected percentage of "yes" responses in the sample is 50.7, and the "corrected" percentage is arrived at by multiplying column B by column C for each regional-sex category, by summing the four products, and by dividing the sum by 100:

15 x 85 = 1275

15 x 90 = 1350

35 x 45 = 1575

35 x 50 = 1750

Sum of the products = 5950 ÷ 100 = 59.5

As the number of standardization variables and the number of categories per variable increase, the computation becomes more complex, but the principle remains the same: each category of the multivariate classification contributes to the corrected percentage in proportion to its representation in the total adult population rather than its representation in the sample.[6]

Percentages adjusted in this manner often have the disadvantage of being more variable from one sample to another than the unadjusted percentages.[7] Why this is true is illustrated by the hypothetical adjustment above for bias by region and sex. The percentage of "yes" responses of southern females is based on a small number of respondents (three percent of the typical national sample would be about 45 cases) and thus is subject to considerable sampling variability. Standardization increases the contribution of this percentage to the total sample percentage and thus increases the sampling variability of the latter. Unfortunately, there is no easily-applied method to determine the effect of a particular adjustment on the standard error, but when one is estimating the significance of a difference between two adjusted percentages, or between an adjusted and an unadjusted one, he or she should keep in mind that the standardization has probably increased the error variance. Increasing the difference required for significance by 15 to 30 percent, depending on whether one or both percentages are adjusted, is probably a sufficiently conservative strategy for dealing with this problem.[8]

In contrast to the hypothetical illustrations above, adjusting actual data for systematic bias rarely changes response percentages by more than two or three points, and often the change is negligible. An illustration with actual data of the effects of adjustment for the underrepresentation of white southerners in the early Gallup samples is given in Table 2. The small differences between the adjusted and unadjusted percentages are rather typical of my experience. Obviously, adjustment is not always worth the effort, and the experienced trend analyst should become able to examine the marginal percentages (with the dependent variable tabulated by each demographic variable on which there is known bias) and decide whether or not adjustment is needed. However, the novice at this kind of research should routinely adjust on any demographic variable on which the sample is biased and with which the dependent variable is even moderately associated. If adjustment makes little difference, he or she may then use the unadjusted percentage.

Of course, there could be an important degree of systematic bias in the early survey data on some of the attitudinal and behavioral variables which are not highly correlated with any of the demographic variables on which there is bias. In such a case, the standardization described above would be ineffective. Little can be done about this possibility, except to keep in mind that the inadvertent bias unique to the older samples resulted primarily from interviewer discretion, and to consider in each case whether or not interviewer discretion might plausibly have biased that particular variable. In most cases, appreciable bias will seem improbable.

The Problem of Sampling Variability

Social scientists often are well-trained in the use of statistics designed for simple random samples, have package computer programs which make those statistics easy to apply, but are ill-prepared to deal with sampling variability in national survey data. National surveys never use simple random samples and rarely use full probability samples, and the quota control sampling used for the earlier surveys was not truly random at any stage. Therefore, use of probability statistics with national survey data is either difficult or problematic, or both. Since few if any of the data covered by this index are from full probability samples, the assumptions for probability statistics, including tests of significance, will not be strictly met in any trend study with these data.

However, the modified probability samples used since the early 1950's are randomly drawn except in the final stage, and even statistical purists rarely object to use of significance tests on data from these samples. Use of significance tests on data from quota control samples is more problematic, but the sampling variability of percentages from those samples has been extensively studied (Stephan and McCarthy, 1958: 211-234), and the standard errors can be estimated. Cautious use of significance tests on these data seems preferable to the likely alternatives, namely, ignoring sampling variability or making rough guesses as to its effect on trend data.

A difficulty with significance tests with modified probability samples (as well as the full probability samples used for national surveys) is that the use of population clusters in the sampling process usually, though not always, makes the standard errors larger than those with simple random samples with the same Ns. Furthermore, the standard error varies from one survey to another for any one variable and from one variable to another on any one survey. Everything else being equal, a variable's standard error varies directly with its correlation with the clusters; that is, the greater the proportion of the variance which is among clusters rather than within clusters, the greater the standard error will be. Therefore, a variable which is the basis for residential segregation (e.g., race, income, and occupational prestige) will have a standard error which is substantially larger than the error to be expected for a simple random sample of the same size, whereas a variable on which there is negligible residential segregation (e.g., sex) will have a standard error which is little if any greater than that for a comparable simple random sample.[9]

Most attitudinal and behavioral variables are not highly correlated with the sample clusters, but one does not usually know a priori that the variable to be studied is not an exception. The correlation in the sample can be determined, of course, and the standard error for a particular variable in a particular sample can be estimated (Kish, 1965), but only through a process so laborious (or expensive if done by computer) that it is impractical for routine use. Therefore, a rather generally accepted convention is to estimate the standard errors for recent national survey data by multiplying the standard errors for simple random samples by a constant--usually 1.25 or 1.3.[10]

This convention is appropriate for the degree of clustering in the typical sampling frame used by national surveys and for the modal degree of geographic maldistribution calculated over a wide variety of attitudinal and demographic variables included in such surveys. As always, common sense in applying this rule of thumb is helpful. That is, for the few variables such as sex on which geographic homogeneity is known to be high, the correction factor may even conservatively be shaded down from 1.25 or 1.3 to 1.1 or 1.15. On the other hand, for variables on which geographic hetergeneity is known to be exceptionally strong, it may be important to increase the correction factor considerably. For example, urban or rural places of residence are by definition maldistributed geographically; most sample clusters are either all urban or all rural. Hence, on an urban-rural variable the increment in error over simple random sample expectations can be much greater than the conventional factor of 1.25 or 1.3. Indeed, precise calculations with a rural-urban variable or close correlates thereof sometimes show a sampling error four times as great as that expected from a simple random sample of the same size! It follows that attitudinal variables which vary along urban-rural lines, such as feelings about farm price supports or, to a milder degree, traditional versus modern values, while scarcely requiring a correction as high as 4.0, may still need to be treated with close respect for the likelihood that their standard errors are well above

1.25 or 1.3 times the simple random sample expectations. Nevertheless, when there is no reason to believe that a variable being examined is either unusually maldistributed geographically or uncommonly homogeneous in its distribution, this rule of thumb remains very useful.[11]

The standard errors of percentages from quota control samples also differ somewhat from one variable to another, because those samples also had a form of clustering. That is, respondents were selected only from certain communities, and for reasons of convenience and economy of effort, each interviewer tended to select respondents within a small geographic area. As in the case of modified probability samples, the standard error for each variable from each survey can be estimated (Stephan and McCarthy, 1958: 226-229), but the procedure is too complex and laborious for routine use. Evidence presented by Stephan and McCarthy (1958: 211-234) on the variability of several variables in series of surveys conducted by several survey organizations suggests that the standard error with quota control samples is typically about 1.5 times the standard error with simple random samples with the same N. However, a higher estimate should be used when there is reason to believe that there was an unusual degree of residential segregation on the variable being studied. Also, as I point out above, if the compared percentages have been adjusted to correct for systematic bias, the estimated standard error should be increased by about 30 percent, and it should be increased by about 15 percent if only one of the percentages has been adjusted.

In a trend study with data gathered at several points in time, tests of significance may be largely superfluous. Consider, for example, the following hypothetical data showing an almost monotonic increase over ten points in time in the adjusted percentage of "yes" responses to an attitude question given by southern white males:

1941 - 15
1943 - 14
1945 - 18
1947 - 21
1949 - 23
1951 - 24
1953 - 22
1955 - 27
1957 - 28

The difference between the 1939 and 1957 percentages probably would not be significant after the appropriate adjustments in the estimate of the standard error, and in any event, using only the end points of the series to test the null hypothesis of no change would waste information. There are several ways to use the data for all ten dates to test the null hypothesis, but anyone familiar with probability theory will know, without any test, that there is a very small probability that each of the five later percentages would be higher than each of the five earlier percentages if the null hypothesis were correct.

Other Problems of Comparability

Before publication of this index, researchers who wished to do trend studies with available survey data could ascertain by various means, such as the Roper Center item file or the Gallup Opinion Index,[12] that data from a series of comparably worded questions were available.

When the codebooks were obtained, however, the repeated questions often turned out to be less nearly comparable than they at first appeared. For instance, response alternatives would be different, or some but not all of the repetitions of the question would be asked only of those respondents who chose a certain alternative of a "filter" question.

This index will in many cases enable the researcher to identify many instances of incomparability without looking at the codebooks, since the repetitions listed as a series should have the same response alternatives, and questions preceded by a "filter" are frequently identified.[13] Nevertheless, one cannot be absolutely certain of the comparability of questions without examining the codebooks. Occasionally, responses to questions with the same ostensible response alternatives are coded differently. For instance, on some Gallup poll questions, "qualified" responses are coded separately, even though "qualified" was not a precoded alternative. Furthermore, in the case of variant wordings of the stems of questions, comparability depends largely on the coding categories, which cannot be compared without the codebooks.*

To illustrate, in the index under "Congress; Level of Information" there are several variant wordings of questions about knowledge of the name of the respondent's Congressman. Although the wording is not the same, the question used by Gallup in the 1940's and 1950's and the one used by Gallup in the 1960's and 1970's should elicit the same information; both seem to ask for a "yes" or "no" response.

*Appendices A-C list the coding categories for certain basic "demographic" background questions used in most of the surveys in this index.

However, respondents to the earlier question who said "yes" were asked to name their Congressman, and the codes separate the bluffers and the mistaken respondents from those who knew the name of their Congressman. In contrast, all of the "yes" respondents to the later question are lumped together.

In this case, comparability (though not a precise measure of changes in knowledge) can be achieved by recombining into one category the "yes" responses to the earlier question; and on many other occasions, collapsing coding categories will provide comparability. If, however, the response alternatives presented to the respondent, and not just the coding categories, are different, collapsing to achieve comparability should be done with great caution. For instance, in the Gallup series of questions on personal happiness, the following two wordings are used:[14]

1. In general, how happy would you say you are--very happy, fairly happy, or not very happy?
2. In general, how happy would you say you are--very happy, fairly happy, or not at all happy?

When the first version was used, a fourth alternative, "not at all happy," was coded, apparently because some respondents gave that response even though it was not presented to them. Since the problem is partly to make a three-point scale comparable with a four-point scale, and since the labels for the two highest points are the same for both scales, one might think that comparability would result from collapsing the two lower categories of the four-point scale. However, comparability is not so easily achieved, since comparison of responses to the two questions asked at brief intervals reveals that the "fairly happy" alternative is more often chosen when the second version is used. Apparently, some of the "not very happy" persons prefer to say that they are "fairly happy" rather than to say that they are "not at all happy." Nor should one just assume that the percentages of "very happy" responses are comparable, although they apparently are, since they do not vary consistently between the two versions:

	Males	Females	Both Sexes
AIPO 369, April, 1946 (Version 1)	38.4%	40.1	39.2
AIPO 399, June, 1947 (Version 2)	38.2	38.7	38.0
AIPO 410T, December, 1947 (Version 1)	37.6	38.0	37.8

Although the two versions of the Gallup "happiness" question can be made comparable by dichotomizing the responses into "very happy" and "all other," neither Gallup version can be made comparable with the NORC happiness question, to which the first response alternative is also "very happy." The NORC question is:

> Taken all together, how would you say things are these days--would you say that you are very happy, pretty happy, or not too happy?

Comparison of responses to the Gallup and NORC questions asked at brief intervals reveals that the Gallup question elicits a somewhat larger percentage of "very happy" responses, apparently because "pretty happy" means to many people a higher degree of happiness than "fairly happy" and thus draws a larger percentage of the responses from the happier people.

In some other cases, whether or not response categories can be collapsed to attain comparability has not been ascertained, but the researcher can test for comparability. For example, Gallup asked a series of job satisfaction questions to which the response alternatives are "satisfied" and "dissatisfied," and two recent NORC surveys used the same question stem but asked the respondents to rate themselves as satisfied, moderately satisfied, a little dissatisfied, or very dissatisfied. Rather good evidence on whether or not collapsing the NORC responses into "satisfied" and "dissatisfied" achieves comparability with the Gallup responses could be obtained by comparing the collapsed responses to the question asked on NORC 9002, conducted in March of 1973, with the responses to the question on AIPO 863, conducted in late January of 1973.

The trend analyst should exercise special care when dealing with a variable which is known to be, or which seems likely to be, subject to considerable short-term fluctuation. An example is church attendance, which varies seasonally and from week to week according to such influences as the weather and the attraction of competing activities. The precise variance of the short-term fluctuation is not known (but might be investigated with available data), but it may be as great as, or greater than, the sampling variance. Since the researcher would not ordinarily be interested in the attendance during any given week but rather would use the data for that week as an indicator of attendance over a longer period of time, the short-term fluctuation in effect increases the error variance and diminishes the confidence which can be placed in the difference between the attendance levels shown by two surveys. Therefore, any trend study on church attendance should use data from at least three or four surveys from each broad period of interest (e.g., the early 1950's or the late 1960's), and the surveys from the different periods should be at least crudely matched as to season.

Some variables are likely to rise and fall in response to evenly spaced events such as elections or in response to unevenly spaced phenomena such as economic recessions. For instance, knowledge of the names of Congressmen is likely to be greater shortly before and after the Congressional elections than at other times, and reported political interest may tend to increase with the approach of a Presidential election. And reports of happiness and other measures of "psychological well-being" are likely to fluctuate with changes in economic conditions. Trend studies usually cannot be based only on data gathered at comparable phases of the business cycle or at points with equal proximity to elections, but the researcher should be sensitive to the possibility that the appearance of a long-term trend may result from use of data gathered at different phases of a cyclical pattern of change.

Special problems plague trend studies with certain segments of the population, blacks being perhaps the most notable example.

Sampling variability is considerable with any small segment of the population and is augmented in the case of blacks by their underrepresentation in many of the earlier samples (see the data on nonwhites in Table 1).[15] Some of the nonwhite subsamples prior to the late 1940's were distinctly biased by region, and correction for that bias is not possible since there were either no southern nonwhite respondents or too few for reliable percentages. To further complicate matters, all or virtually all of the interviewers for the earlier surveys were white, whereas the survey organizations have recently added black interviewers, and at least some of them are working toward, but have not yet achieved, complete racial matching of interviewers and households.[16] Since the race of the interviewer is known to influence the responses of blacks to several kinds of questions (Williams, 1964; 1968), some recent changes in nonwhite responses may reflect changes in interviewer effects rather than in the variables the questions are designed to measure. Moreover, interviewer effects may have changed not only because of the recent use of black interviewers but also because blacks have become less deferential toward whites and thus less "acquiescent" in their responses to white interviewers.

Although these problems are formidable, they should not discourage all trend studies of nonwhites with available survey data. If one avoids the more biased of the early samples and the questions for which the race of interviewers is likely to make the most difference (e.g., questions on race relations), the most serious problem is sampling variability. And even that problem can be largely overcome if there are data from several points in time, and especially if data from surveys conducted within short periods of time can be pooled to augment the N. For instance, a study with Gallup data on nonwhite voting and party identification since 1950 could yield findings more trustworthy than those from most studies with survey data. Furthermore, trend data on nonwhites may be of interest even if one cannot decide whether the indicated trends reflect changes in response bias or changes in the variables ostensibly measured. For instance, nonwhite respondents differed little from whites in reported satisfaction and happiness in the late 1940's but were, as a whole, sharply lower than whites in reported "psychological well-being" in the early 1960's (when there were still few black interviewers). The relative satisfaction of nonwhites may have decreased (perhaps for reasons treated by relative deprivation theory),[17] or nonwhites may simply have become less reluctant to express dissatisfaction to white interviewers, but in any event, the increased expressions of dissatisfaction indicate important changes in race relations in American society.

The final source of incomparability to be discussed here poses no problem but should not be overlooked. Until persons 18-20 years old were given the franchise throughout the country, national surveys generally sampled people age 21 and older, but now 18-20-year-olds are included in the usual samples of all major national survey organizations. Although persons 18-20 are a very small percentage of the recent samples, they must be excluded to achieve precise comparability with the earlier samples.

Some Problems with Cohort Analysis

Many of the data covered by this index are appropriate for cohort analysis as well as simple trend studies. Originally applied primarily by demographers to decennial census data and similar demographic data, cohort analysis has recently become popular as a means for studying nondemographic dependent variables from survey sample data. Although its utility for understanding social and cultural change and the social and psychological aspects of human aging may have been exaggerated by its more enthusiastic proponents, it is undoubtedly a valuable analytic tool if it is properly used.

There are many kinds of cohort studies, but most of them (1) deal with birth cohorts (a birth cohort being the people born within a given period of time) and (2) compare data for two or more points in time for each cohort studied. That is, the cohort analyst looks at trends within cohorts as well as at trends in the total adult population. Therefore, the cohort analyst who uses available survey data faces all of the problems faced by the trend analyst plus a few others.

To discuss all of the technical, methodological, and logical problems of cohort analysis with survey sample data would take far more space than can be devoted to this essay. The reader who contemplates cohort studies with Roper Center data should consult the growing body of literature on the methods of cohort analysis with survey sample data and should examine some of the published results of "nondemographic" cohort studies.[18] However, I would be remiss if I did not list and briefly discuss a few problems and considerations which users of this index should take into account before deciding whether or not to attempt cohort studies:

1. Sampling variability poses greater problems for cohort analysis than simple trend studies. In a national sample of 1,500, the Ns for the younger ten-year cohorts average around 300 to 350 and the N for the cohort aged 70-79 may be no more than 60 or 70. Obviously, successful use of the data from only two or three surveys is more problematic with cohort analysis than with simple trend studies. However, the problem of small cohort Ns is mitigated somewhat by the fact that the early opinion polls tended to use large samples, the typical N for Gallup polls conducted during the 1940s being around 3,000.[19] Furthermore, it is often possible to pool data from several surveys conducted in each year covered by the analysis. For instance, in a cohort analysis of political party identification from 1945 to 1971, pooling of Gallup poll data achieved a mean N for ten-year cohorts of 1,232 (Glenn, 1972).

2. Systematic bias poses somewhat different problems for cohort analysis than for simple trend studies. The effects of changes in sample design on the distribution of education and other status variables in cohort samples are more dramatically evident than the effects on the total adult samples. For instance, the data on one cohort in Table 3 show a steep decline in educational attainments from 1945 to 1965.[20] Of course, the reason for the greater apparent effects on the cohort data is that educational attainments in the total adult population, in contrast to those in the cohort, rose substantially and thus largely offset the effects of the changes in sample design. Fortunately, correction for the educational bias in the early cohort samples is easily achieved, since the educational distribution in one of the later samples can be used as the estimate of the correct distribution for all dates in a series.

It may not be possible to obtain data on the regional, sex, and race distributions in each cohort at each date from census reports, but fairly accurate estimates can be made. Even in the absence of sex bias, it is desirable to weight the male and female responses equally for each cohort at each date. Although the proportion of females increases in an aging cohort due to the greater mortality of males, the effects of this differential mortality should be removed if, as usually is the case, the purpose of the analysis is to infer change among the surviving members of a cohort.

3. Uneven spacing of the repetitions of questions often makes cohort analysis with survey sample data more awkward than cohort analysis with census data. Demographers who do cohort analysis with decennial census data use a "square" cohort matrix in which the interval between dates is the same as the span of years covered by each cohort (see Table 4 for an example of a "square" matrix constructed from survey sample data). Sets of cross-sectional data are juxtaposed so that different cohorts at one point in time can be compared by reading down the columns, different cohorts in the same age range can be compared by reading across the rows, and each cohort can be traced through time by reading diagonally down and to the right. This arrangement of the data has several advantages; for instance, it allows use of the cohort rather than the individual as the unit of analysis in attempts to discern "cohort effects," "period effects," and "age effects" (see Mason et al., 1973). However, suppose that comparable data are available for 1948, 1951, 1958, and 1970. Obviously, a "square" matrix cannot be constructed from these data, but if age is coded in exact years, cohorts can be traced across the four dates. In such cases, it is useful to construct two tables, one in which cohorts can be traced by reading across the rows and another in which comparable sets of cross-sectional data are juxtaposed as in a "square" cohort matrix. By coding each respondent according to membership in the cohorts delineated in the first table, according to membership in the age categories in the second table, and according to the date of the survey ("period"), and by using the individual as the unit of analysis, even the more sophisticated techniques of cohort analysis (such as the one set forth in Mason et al., 1973), can be applied with cohort data from unevenly spaced surveys.

4. Cohort analysis with survey sample data is difficult if age is not coded in exact years. If age is coded by broad intervals and if the intervals between the repetitions of a question do not coincide in years with the age intervals, precise tracing of a cohort from one survey to another is not possible. Fortunately, however, Gallup began coding age in exact years in 1937, so the Gallup time series are usually amenable to cohort analysis.[21] Although many of the other early surveys do not provide exact age codes, they can be used as the starting point for a cohort series if the later surveys in the series have exact age codes. Furthermore, a recent article sets forth procedures for cohort analysis when there are no exact age codes and the surveys are unevenly spaced (Price, 1974). These procedures estimate rather than precisely measure trends within cohorts and are based on the assumption that change is continuous rather than disjunctive. Nevertheless, they can be useful when less "messy" data for the purpose at hand are not available.

5. Cohort analysis is complicated by the confounding of cohort, period, and age effects. However one examines a "square" cohort matrix (whether by reading down the columns, across the rows, or down and across the cohort diagonals), two kinds of effects are confounded and cannot be separated by any simple, straightforward method. In each column, cohort and age effects are confounded; in each row, cohort and period effects are confounded; and in each cohort diagonal, age and period effects are confounded. Stated differently, each cohort is defined by period and age, each age interval is defined by cohort and period, and each period is defined by cohort and age. This is a classic example of the "identification problem" (Blalock, 1966), which arises when an independent variable in an analysis is a perfect function of two other variables. The "problem" arises from the fact that it is impossible to vary the independent variable while holding constant the two variables which define it.

Because of the identification problem, cohort analysis does not provide unambiguous evidence on the effects of human aging, contrary to the claims of some authors. To illustrate, the data in Table 4 do not conclusively demonstrate any effects of growing older on reported happiness. The cross-sectional data show a higher level of happiness at the younger ages than at the older ages, but the meaning of that difference is ambiguous. Were the older people less happy, as a whole, because they were older or because they were members of different cohorts with different formative experiences and generally different "cohort situations?"[22] The meaning of the intra-cohort trend data is similarly ambiguous. From 1946 to 1956, there was an increase in reported happiness in each cohort, but did those changes result from aging or from changes in the society and in nonage-determined personal situations during the decade? In this case, one can be almost certain that the intra-cohort changes did not result solely from aging, since reported happiness also increased at each age level during the decade, and aging from 1956 to 1966 was not associated with increased happiness in any of the cohorts.[23] However, one cannot tell from "eyeballing" the data just what the effects of aging were.

Various statistical solutions to the identification problem in cohort analysis have been proposed, perhaps the most sophisticated and appealing of which is the method using Multiple Classification

Analysis proposed by Mason et. al. (1973). However, all of these methods are somewhat controversial, and all involve "simplifying assumptions" which may not be realistic in specific cases. Ultimately, any solution to the problem will depend on the researcher's knowledge of recent history and of theories of aging. For instance, the researcher very knowledgeable of recent American political history will pretty well know what were the recent period influences which combined with influences from the aging process to produce intra-cohort trends in political behavior and orientations.

If the purpose of cohort analysis is simply to provide a more detailed description of recent change than is provided by simple trend data,[24] solving the identification problem may not be very important. One may only wish to know to what extent an observed change in the adult population resulted from mortality, from addition of new individuals to the adult population, and from change among persons who were in the adult population at both compared dates. Or one may wish to allocate the third component among individuals of different ages, to investigate, for instance, the extent to which older adults participate in major attitudinal shifts of the population.

In any event, a cohort matrix such as Table 4 almost always is interesting and useful, even though precise separation of the confounded effects in it is not possible.

FOOTNOTES

1. For description and discussion of some of the most notable trend studies with Roper Center data, see Hyman (1972: chapter 6). Trend studies with Roper Center data include Rosenthal (1967); Mueller (1970); Glenn (1973a); Reed (1972); Stember (1966); Glenn and Hyland (1967); and Alford (1962).

2. For instance, if sex and region are both control variables, males will be correctly represented and southerners will be correctly represented. However, unless there are controls on combinations of variables (as there sometimes are), southern males (or nonsouthern females, and so forth) may not be correctly represented.

3. The term "omnibus" refers to "general purpose" or "regular" surveys in contrast to "special purpose" surveys. The latter sometimes had samples of different design than the omnibus survey samples of the same period.

"AIPO" refers to "American Institute of Public Opinion," which is the official title of the American Gallup polling organization.

It should not be assumed that once a population segment was proportionally represented in one of a survey organization's samples that it was proportionally represented in all subsequent samples of that organization. For instance, females were proportionally represented in AIPO 335, conducted in November of 1944, but were not proportionally represented in the first Gallup omnibus survey in 1946. Therefore, Table 1 serves only as a rough guide to the changes in sample design. Consulting it is not a substitute for examining the marginal percentages from each survey to be used in a trend study.

4. There is considerable variation in sample design among contemporary survey organizations, and the sketchy description of a "typical" design provided here is not meant to substitute for knowledge of the samples of specific survey organizations. For information on the latter, see the descriptions included in this volume.

5. For a more technical discussion of this technique, see Bishop et al. (1974: chapter 4). See also Reed (1972: 96-103) and Rosenberg (1962).

Otis Dudley Duncan has pointed out to me that "test factor standardization" has been made obsolete for most of the purposes for which it has been used by the methodology of loglinear models and multiway contingency tables (see Bishop et al., 1974). However, for the purpose of compiling descriptive trend data, standardization is still appropriate. I emphasize it here since I assume that even most of those researchers who will perform more complex analyses will also wish to develop information on recent change in American society which can be communicated to persons who are not statistically sophisticated. Percentages corrected by means of standardization have the advantage of being understandable to many persons who could not understand more complex data.

6. In adjusting for bias on amount of education, one should resist the temptation to use an educational dichotomy, since to do so will result in "underadjustment." At least three, and preferably four, educational levels should be used.

When there is bias on education, there is almost always bias on income and occupation also, and since the three major status variables are only moderately correlated, adjusting only on education is not likely to remove all of the effects on the dependent variable of the underrepresentation of low status persons. However, adjusting on income and occupation is usually not possible, since the early surveys did not code income or "economic level" in a manner comparable with census data, and occupation was not coded for a substantial proportion of each sample. One can do little about this problem of "underadjustment" except to take it into account in interpreting the data.

Estimates of the "correct" distribution of a variable on which adjustment is to be made can be derived by interpolation from decennial census data or for some dates can be obtained from the Current Population Reports.

7. Under certain conditions (e.g., very high correlation of the dependent variable with the "standardization" variable, lack of control of the standardization variable by the quota, etc.), standardized percentages vary less from sample to sample than unstandardized percentages, and standardization may be used to reduce sampling variability. However, those conditions usually will not obtain when one is adjusting for bias in the early survey samples.

8. This statement is based on my experience with only about a dozen series of adjusted percentages. Experience with a great number or a greater variety of series might lead to a somewhat different conclusion.

9. I use race, income, occupation, and sex for illustrative purposes here only because the approximate degree of residential segregation on these variables is known. In fact, some of these variables are often controlled by quotas and thus vary little from sample to sample. In any event, one would not use Roper Center data to study trends on these variables, since better data are available from decennial census enumerations and the Current Population Survey.

10. An alternative suggested by the NORC is to assume that a national sample has about the same efficiency as a simple random sample two-thirds as large.

11. This paragraph is adapted from a comment by Philip Converse.

12. The Gallup Opinion Index, published monthly since 1966, reports current Gallup poll data and occasional trend data from earlier polls. The trend data are reported without the exact wording of the earlier questions.

13. If one question in a series is preceded by a filter and another one is not, the survey with the unfiltered question sometimes (though rarely) contains the information with which to "filter" the question.

14. A third version used on at least one occasion is: "In general, how happy would you say you are--very happy, fairly happy, not very happy, or not at all happy?"

15. Most of the earlier surveys do not separate blacks from other nonwhites. (For instance, the early Gallup polls code all nonwhites as "colored.") Therefore, the black (or Negro) respondents and other nonwhite respondents to the later surveys must be combined to achieve precise comparability with the earlier data.

16. For obvious reasons, widespread residential integration would almost certainly preclude complete racial matching of interviewers and households.

17. See the chapter entitled "Actual Gains and Psychological Losses" in Pettigrew (1964).

18. The publications on methods include Price (1974); Mason _et al._(1973); Glenn and Zody (1970); Evan (1959); Evan (1968); Hyman (1972: 274-290); and Riley _et al._(1972: chapter 2). Some examples of cohort analysis with survey sample data are in Crittenden (1962); Cutler (1969-1970); Glenn and Grimes (1968); Glenn and Hefner (1972); Glenn (1972); and Abramson (1974).

19. The Gallup polls conducted during this period usually consisted of a "K" and a "T" version, each with a sample of about 1,500. Usually (but not always) the question of interest was asked and was worded the same on both versions. The "K" and "T" samples were independently drawn and were used for such purposes as estimating sampling variability and testing for the effects of variant question wording.

20. In fact, educational attainments increase slightly in a cohort as it ages beyond young adulthood; some individuals complete additional years of school, and cohort attrition through mortality is somewhat greater among the less educated, if only because they are slightly older on the average than the better educated cohort members.

21. However, Gallup poll data gathered from 1937 through 1941 are not ideal for cohort analysis since age was estimated by the interviewer rather than reported by the respondent, and thus the age data are subject to substantial error.

22. Aspects of the cohort situation include the size (in number of people) of the cohort relative to older and younger cohorts, economic conditions when the cohort entered the labor market, and so forth.

23. Cohort attrition through mortality should be taken into account in interpreting these data, since there is evidence that happier people tend to live longer than less happy people (Palmore and Jeffers, 1971). That is, an increase in the aggregate reported happiness in an aging cohort could be the result of selective mortality rather than an increase in the happiness of the surviving cohort members, or the effects of mortality could offset a tendency for happiness to decline among surviving cohort members. Most other dependent variables are less likely to be related to longevity, but the possible effect of cohort attrition on trends within aging cohorts should always be considered by the cohort analyst. For a demonstration that an observed trend within a cohort could not have resulted from differential mortality, see Glenn and Zody (1970).

24. This is the use of cohort analysis advocated by Ryder (1965). For an example, see Glenn (1972).

THE ROPER PUBLIC OPINION RESEARCH CENTER AND ITS SERVICES

The establishment of the Roper Center over 25 years ago[1] was at that time a highly innovative if not unique effort in the world of social science. The importance of the resource has since been attested to by the dramatic increase in the use of the Center by both the American and international community of social science scholars. The Roper Center has become not only a national, but an international resource. In 1946, the Center's data bank consisted of 115 Roper studies. At present, it contains over 13,000 data sets (dating from 1936) contributed by 122 survey research organizations in 74 countries. The Roper Center annually acquires between 400 and 500 additional data sets.

Most important, the usage of the Roper Center by the community of scholars, government agencies, foundations, and non-profit research organizations has in twenty-seven years grown from fifteen accesses annually to over 2,500 per year. At present, thirty-seven educational institutions in the United States and Canada have formally affiliated with the Roper Center through its International Survey Library Association program, an active partnership between the Roper Center and the academic community. Through membership in the ISLA program, the financial burden of using the Center's data and services is shifted from the individual scholar to his institution. Further, service fees charged to members are approximately 50 percent less than those applicable to users located at non-member academic institutions. The Center is currently negotiating membership in ISLA with many other American and foreign universities. For further information on the Roper Center and the International Survey Library Association, the reader is invited to write:

[1] Through Williams College, surveys conducted by Roper Research Associates, Incorporated were made available to scholars as early as 1946. Since 1957, the Gallup organization and its foreign affiliates, plus many other research organizations, have been placing their data at the Roper Center.

Services of the Roper Center

Generally, the Roper Center provides three main types of service to its users: (1) search and retrieval; (2) data set reproduction; and (3) analysis. A typical processing of the main types of service requests involves the following steps:

Step 1: On request, the Roper Center's staff searches the question index file for items relevant to the scholar's research problem. The output sent to the researcher is a listing, either computer-generated or xeroxed, of potentially relevant questions (text, month and year of survey, approximate sample size, and identification of survey organization). This is a normal service of the Roper Center, but the existence of this index will make this step unnecessary in many cases.

Step 2: At this stage users may request a copy of the questionnaire(s) containing the item(s) of central importance to their research. The questionnaire indicates what other attitudinal/behavioral variables and demographic data were also included in the survey. Xerox copies of questionnaires may be purchased from the Roper Center.[1]

A second option for the user is to order a copy of the entire codebook which provides such additional information as: open-ended question response categories; sampling specifications; weighting procedures; and, for AIPO (Gallup) codebooks, the marginal distributions for each question. While demographic data are summarized to a large extent in Appendices A through C of this volume, detailed demographic information is included in the codebooks themselves. The cost of the codebook[2] is credited in its entirety if the purchaser ultimately buys a duplicate of the response data for the study. Sources of marginals for some of the questions listed in this index are suggested in Appendix D of this volume. All are available through the Roper Center. In addition, the Roper Public Opinion Research Center will, upon request, provide information on the specifications of particular surveys in its archives.

Step 3: Alternative A - Analysis: Upon written authorization from the researcher and following his specifications, the Roper Center's technical staff will process the data. Analysis requests typically involve one or more of the following:

[1] The charge to purchasers was approximately 40¢ per page at the time of publication of this volume. The questionnaires for AIPO (Gallup) surveys average 4-6 pages.

[2] The charge was approximately $24 per machine readable codebook at the time of publication of this volume.

Marginal (total sample) results with percentages[1]

Multi-variable cross-tabulations with percentages (the Roper Center's present programming capacity is at the five variable level). Cost estimates on request.

Step 3: Alternative B - Data set reproduction: A data set consists of the response data on magnetic tape or punch cards, and collateral documentation including sampling procedures, weighting processes, population universe, etc.[2] Those wishing to order duplicate data sets should note the availability of limited funds for this purpose at SSRC's Center for Social Indicators (see the Introduction to this volume).

Typically, public opinion survey data are coded on standard EAM (Electronic Accounting Machines) data cards using the column binary or multi/alphabetic punch method of coding. This is the case for about 90 percent of the data sets at the Roper Center. For those scholars using unit record equipment -- e.g., counter-sorters, IBM 101's, etc. -- no problem exists. There is a problem, however, for those users requesting duplicates of the original data with the intention of reading and analyzing the data on most computers. Even though the Roper Center maintains many of its files in their original form, it has developed the necessary routines to recode ("spray") multi- and zone-punched data into expanded acceptable tape records. Data tapes can be generated at the Roper Center according to the following specifications:

[1] The charge was approximately $7.50 per table at the time of publication of this volume.

[2] The charge for processing and reproducing a data set was $350 at the time of publication of this volume. Inquiries regarding the cost of already processed data sets should be addressed to the Roper Public Opinion Research Center.

PREFERRED	ALTERNATIVE
(1) IBM Hub	Same
(2) 1/2 inch tape	Same
(3) 800 BPI	200 or 556 BPI
(4) 7 Track	9 Track
(5) Character	Binary
(6) Even Parity	Odd Parity
(7) 960 BCD character block size maximum	1920 Binary
(8) IBM character set	Same

With the exception of the Gallup studies (AIPO, POS), all surveys cited in this catalog may be obtained on a straight purchase basis. Duplicates of the Gallup data may be obtained on loan. The essential term of the loan agreement is:

> "Not to reduplicate card decks (or tapes) for > further rediffusion unless permission to do > so has been granted in writing by the Roper
> Public Opinion Research Center"

The initial term of the loan is typically one year, but loans may be renewed annually (at no further cost to the user) for as long as the recipient wishes to use the data.

For search/retrieval services, the fees cover staff time at an hourly rate, materials, machine and postage costs plus a small overhead. Analysis fees are made on a per table basis, and data set reproduction on a per study basis. A detailed fee schedule may be obtained by writing to:

INDEX EDITING PROCEDURES

This volume consists of an index of questions repeated in a time span of a year or more, and the variants of these questions. Only questions drawn from American national samples (primarily of the general population) have been included. The basic data for over 90 percent of the surveys cited are available only from the Roper Center. The earliest survey included in this index was undertaken in September, 1936, and the most recent survey was conducted in October, 1973. The index material was assembled during the second half of 1973, and the catalog was compiled during the spring and summer of 1974.

For each time series, the exact text of the question is followed by citations for the surveys containing that question. The identifying information includes: the organization, the survey number, the survey date, and the question number. A typical question entry, with an illustration of the first citation, is shown below.

ILLUSTRATIVE CITATION

DO YOU THINK IT SHOULD BE LEGAL OR ILLEGAL FOR PRIVATE CITIZENS TO HAVE LOADED WEAPONS IN THEIR HOMES?

AIPO # 616 JULY 1959 (27)

AIPO # 704 JAN. 1965 (23)

LEGEND

AIPO:	American Institute of Public Opinion (The Gallup Poll).
616:	Survey number..
JULY 1959:	Date of start of field interviewing.
(27):	Question number.

The same information is provided for variant wordings of the main question. When relevant, additional information such as special groups (women, whites, labor leaders, etc.) is provided. To economize on space, a question repeated 25 times or more is followed only by an indication of the number of times and the first and last dates on which it occurred. (For example, "This question was repeated 97 times between Dec. 1943 and Sept. 1970.")

WORDING

In compiling this index, the basic guideline was to include those questions repeated with exact wording. However, exceptions have been made in the following cases.

A. VARIANTS. Variants are listed after the main question and their wording differs somewhat from that of the main question. Variants usually occur only once (on a single survey); however, they can be repeated with exact wording and yet be included as variants when the time span involved is less than 12 months. Following is an example of a main question followed by three variants, two of which have identical wording but a time span of less than 12 months.

WOULD YOU FAVOR ADDING A LAW TO THE CONSTITUTION TO PREVENT ANY PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES FROM SERVING A THIRD TERM?

AIPO # 178 NOV. 1939 (12) (A FORM)
AIPO # 351 JULY 1945 (5) (K FORM)
AIPO # 444 JUNE 1949 (17)

VARIANT WOULD YOU FAVOR A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT PROHIBITING ANY PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES FROM SERVING A THIRD TERM?

AIPO # 131 AUG. 1938 (15)

DO YOU FAVOR ADDING A LAW TO THE CONSTITUTION TO PREVENT ANY PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES FROM SERVING MORE THAN TWO TERMS?

AIPO # 390 FEB. 1947 (3)
AIPO # 393 MAR. 1947 (4)

B. VARIANT WORDS OR PHRASES. In some cases, "main questions" have been included as such in spite of slightly variant wording. When this occurs, the variant word or phrase is in parentheses and the survey from which the variation comes is marked with an asterisk. This has been done only in cases where the variation was considered slight and when the question otherwise would have been discarded or "lost". For example:

WHAT IS THE TYPE OF FUEL (TYPE OF FUEL IS) MAINLY USED TO HEAT THE PLACE WHERE YOU LIVE?

AIPO # 289 FEB. 1943 (11F)
AIPO # 339 JAN. 1945 (9D)*

In AIPO # 339, the question was phrased, "What type of fuel is mainly used to heat the place where you live?" (In contrast, the variant of this question is: "What kind of fuel do you use to heat your home?")

C. SCALOMETERS. These questions ask the respondent to rate various men, countries, and organizations on a 10 point scale which runs from PLUS 5, or the highest rating, to MINUS 5, the lowest rating. The introductions to and instructions for these questions are cumbersome and often use slightly variant wording. Consequently, we have not included the introductions. Instead, the following phraseology has been used to introduce the questions: /Scalometer/ Plus 5-4-3-2-1

Minus 1-2-3-4-5 and a sentence such as "Please indicate how far up the scale or how far down the scale you would rate X." The only segments which will be exactly duplicated in a given time series of a scalometer question will be the 10 point scale card (handed to the respondent) and the name of the man, country, or organization, etc. in question. For instance, a series of scalometers dealing with England and another series asking about Great Britain are treated as two differently worded questions.

D. FILTER QUESTION. A filter question is a series in which the second (third, fourth, etc.) part of the question cannot be asked independently of the preceding part. Sometimes, however, the series is interrupted. In such cases we have labelled the surveys which use the complete question as "(Filter)". Those which contain only a part of the series are identified thus: "(PART 1 ONLY)" "(PARTS 1&2 ONLY)" etc. For example:

DO YOU THINK IT IS ALL RIGHT FOR CHILDREN TO CHEW BUBBLE GUM, OR NOT?
/IF NO/ WHY DO YOU OBJECT TO CHILDREN CHEWING BUBBLE GUM?

AIPO # 482	NOV. 1951	(18)	(FILTER)
AIPO # 515	MAY 1953	(19)	(FILTER)
AIPO # 533	JUNE 1954	(24)	(PART 1 ONLY)

In AIPO # 533, only the first of the two questions was asked.

APPENDICES

Appendices A through C describe the sample designs, and the coding categories for certain basic "demographic" background questions, used in most of the surveys cited in this index.

Appendix A:	American Institute of Public Opinion (The Gallup Organization).
Appendix B:	National Opinion Research Center.
Appendix C:	The Roper Organization, Inc. (Commercial and Fortune)

Comparable information for surveys conducted by other organizations cited in this index may be obtained from the Roper Public Opinion Research Center, Post Office Box 624, Williams College, Williamstown, Massachusetts 01267.

Appendix D describes sources of marginal distributions of responses for some of the surveys represented in this index, including a listing of the topics covered in "The Polls" section of Public Opinion Quarterly since 1961, cross-referenced to the Roper Center's subject categories.

APPENDIX A: AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC OPINION: A SUMMARY OF SAMPLING PROCEDURES AND TYPICAL DEMOGRAPHICS

A. SAMPLE DESIGN

The sampling procedure described is designed to produce an approximation of the adult civilian population living in the United States, except for those persons in institutions such as prisons or hospitals.

Prior to 1950, the samples for all Gallup surveys, excluding special surveys, were a combination of what is known as a purposive design for the selection of cities, towns, and rural areas, and the quota method for the selection of individuals within such selected areas.

The first step in obtaining the sample was to draw a national sample of places (cities, towns, and rural areas). These were distributed by six regions and five or six city sizes, urban-rural groups or strata in proportion to the distribution of the population of voting age by these regional-city size strata. The distribution of cases between the non-South and South, however, was on the basis of the vote in presidential elections.

Within each region the sample of such places was drawn separately for each of the larger states and for groups of smaller states. The places were selected to provide broad geographic distribution within states and at the same time in combination to be politically representative of the state or group of states in terms of three previous elections. Specifically they were selected so that in combination they matched the state vote for three previous elections within small tolerances. Great emphasis was placed on election data as a control in the era from 1935 to 1950.

Within the civil divisions in the sample, respondents were selected on the basis of age, sex and socio-economic quotas. Otherwise, interviewers were given considerable latitude within the sample areas, being permitted to draw their cases from households and from persons on the street anywhere in the community.

All Gallup polls since 1950 have been based on a national probability sample of interviewing areas. Refinements in the sample design have been introduced at various points in time since then. However, over this period the design in its essentials has conformed to the current procedure, as follows:

1. The United States is divided into seven size-of-community strata: cities of population 1,000,000 and over; 250,000 to 999,999; and 50,000 to 249,999; with the urbanized areas of all these cities forming a single stratum; cities of 2,500 to 49,999; rural villages; and farm or open country rural areas.
2. Within each of these strata, the population is further divided into seven regions; New England, Middle Atlantic, East Central, West Central, South, Mountain, and Pacific Coast.
3. Within each size-of-community and regional stratum the population is arrayed in geographic order and zoned into equal-sized groups of sampling units.

4. In each zone, pairs of localities are selected with probability of selection proportional to the size of each locality's population--producing two replicated samples of localities.

5. Within selected cities for which population data are reported by census tracts or enumeration districts, these sample subdivisions are drawn with probability of selection proportional to the size of the population.

6. For other cities, minor civil divisions, and rural areas in the sample for which population data are not reported by census tracts or enumeration districts, small, definable geographic areas are drawn, with the probability of selection proportional to size where available data permit; otherwise with equal probability.

7. Within each subdivision selected for which block statistics are available, a block or block cluster is drawn with probability of selection proportional to the number of dwelling units.

8. In cities and towns for which block statistics are not available, blocks are drawn at random, that is, with equal probability.

9. In subdivisions that are rural or open country in character, segments approximately equal in size of population are delineated and drawn with equal probability.

10. In each cluster of blocks and each segment so selected, a randomly selected starting point is designated on the interviewer's map of the area. Starting at this point, interviewers are required to follow a given direction in the selection of households, taking households in sequence, until their assigned number of interviews has been completed.

11. Within each occupied dwelling unit or household reached, the interviewer asks to speak to the youngest man 18 or older at home, or if no man is at home, the oldest woman 18 or older. This method of selection within the household has been developed empirically to produce an age distribution by men and women separately which compares closely with the age distribution of the population. It increases the probability of selecting younger men, who are at home relatively infrequently, and the probability of reaching older women in the household who tend to be under-represented unless given a disproportionate chance of being drawn from among those at home. The method of selection among those at home within the household is not strictly random, but it is systematic and objective and eliminates interviewer judgment in the selection process.

12. Interviewing is conducted at times when adults are most likely to be at home, which means on weekends or if on weekdays, after 4:00 P.M. for women and after 6:00 P.M. for men.

13. Allowance for persons not at home is made by a "times-at-home" weighting procedure rather than by "call-backs". This procedure is a standard method for reducing the sample bias that would otherwise result from under-representation of persons who are difficult to find at home.

14. The pre-stratification by regions is routinely supplemented by fitting each obtained sample to the latest available Census Bureau estimates of the regional distribution of the population. Also minor adjustments of the sample are made by educational attainment (by men and women separately), based on the annual estimates of the Census Bureau derived from their Current Population Survey.

APPENDIX B: NATIONAL OPINION RESEARCH CENTER: A SUMMARY OF SAMPLING PROCEDURES AND TYPICAL DEMOGRAPHICS

A. SAMPLE DESIGN

The samples used were persons twenty-one years of age and older, resident within the continental United States. They were limited to the civilian, non-institutional population. Prior to August, 1945, the samples included approximately 2500 individuals, and since that date, approximately 1300.

In the earlier surveys, quota sampling was used. But since September, 1953, the local sample areas--city blocks or other small specifically defined neighborhoods--were all selected by random methods, and interviewers were required to canvass these small areas (following a predesignated route) and to interview all persons found at home who met specified age, sex, and race quotas. This modified form of probability sampling was introduced in a few areas in 1949, but the transition to it was not completely effected until 1953.

While it is likely that the later sampling method reduced the bias of quota sampling to a reasonably low level, quota bias plus random sampling error meant that no confidence should be placed in small differences (less than five percentage points). Interviewing in all cases was handled by NORC's national field staff, the members of which were personally recruited and professionally trained.

1958 - 1962

The Roper Center has no NORC surveys conducted in this time span.

1963 - 1973

The universe sampled in these studies is the total non-institutional population of the United States, 21 years of age or older. The sample is a standard multi-stage area probability sample to the block or segment level. At the block level, however, quota sampling is used with quotas based on sex, age, race and employment status.

The primary sampling units employed derived from NORC's 1953 Master Sample. The primary sampling units in the Master Sample had been selected with probabilities proportionate to their estimated 1953 populations. Population shifts in the past decade have rendered that set of PSU's a less efficient primary stage than it was when initially selected. Nevertheless, since a well-trained and experienced field force was available in that set of PSU's, it was obviously desirable to update the sample by some procedure which minimized the number of sampling units which needed to be changed. A procedure suggested by Nathan Keyfitz was employed. It involved the comparison of the desired 1960 probabilities of selection for PSU's to their original 1950 probabilities. If the originally selected PSU had a lower original probability than was warranted by its 1960 population, it was retained in the new sample and assigned the desired probability. If the originally selected PSU had a higher probability than was now warranted, it was subjected to the possibility of being dropped. The probability of retention for such a PSU was the ratio of its desired probability to its original probability. Replacements for dropped PSU's were made from among those PSU's which had not fallen into the 1953 sample and for which the 1953 probability was lower than that desired in 1960, the probability of 1960 selection being a function of the amount of growth the unit had undergone.

Basically, this method preserves the stratification based on the 1950 classifications of geographic regions, size of largest town, median family income, economic characteristics, and in the South, by race. Counties which the Census Bureau classified as non-metropolitan in 1950 but as metropolitan in 1960 were, however, shifted to metropolitan strata. This restratification complicated the computation of selection probabilities but, in all likelihood, served to increase somewhat the efficiency of the sample.

Localities: Within each selected PSU, localities were ordered according to cities with block statistics, other urban places, urbanized Minor Civil Divisions, the non-urbanized MCS's, with the places ordered by 1960 population within each of these categories. Localities were selected from this list using a random start and applying a designated skip interval to the cumulative 1960 population. This provided stratification according to size and urban type of locality, and at the same time selection with probability proportionate to size.

Where available, 1960 Census block statistics were used. Blocks were selected with probabilities proportionate to the population in the block. In places without block statistics, Census enumeration districts were selected with probabilities proportional to the number of households. The selected districts were then divided into segments and estimates of the number of households within each segment were obtained by field counts. The selection of segments was then made with probability proportionate to the number of households.

The average cluster size is 3.5 respondents. Past experience would suggest that for most purposes this sample of 1,500 could be considered as having about the same efficiency as a simple random sample of 1,000.

At the block or segment level, the interviewer begins his travel pattern at a random dwelling unit which has been previously designated and proceeds in a specified direction until his quotas have been filled. In the South, segments have been selected by race of respondent. This has been done since accuracy of response is increased when Negroes are interviewed by Negro interviewers in the South. Elsewhere, the interviewer is given no race quotas.

The quotas call for approximately equal numbers of men and women with the exact proportion in each location determined by the 1960 Census. For women, the additional requirement is imposed that there be the proper proportion of employed and unemployed women in the location. Again these quotas are based on the 1960 Census. For men, the added requirement is that there be the proper proportion of men over and under 30 in the location.

Economic Level: A Group -- "Wealthy"

Out of every 100 families in a community, the two most prosperous--or wealthy--belong in this top economic group. Thus, in a city of 10,000 population, comprising perhaps 2,500 families, about 50 families would fall into the A group. Generally speaking, these A families have, or could have if they wished, all the necessities and comforts of life, and they can afford all the luxuries appropriate to the community in which they live. While the concrete evidences of wealth and prosperity differ from place to place, the common denominator for the A group is the fact that they generally can afford the luxuries which are available in the community or area in which they reside.

A persons will be found following certain occupations more frequently than others. The head of an A family is likely to be a business executive, a bank president, a large cattle rancher, a holder of mining interests, a lawyer, a physician, or the like. Many A's have a high level of formal education. A good number will be older persons.

B Group -- "Upper Middle Class"

Second highest in our scale of standard-of-living groups are the 14 next-most-prosperous families out of every 100--a group which might also be called "upper middle class". Like members of the A group, the B's can take the necessities and comforts of life for granted, but they differ from the A's in that their choice of the luxuries available in their community is limited. Unlike A's, B's must choose which luxuries they want most.

The breadwinner of a B family is frequently a professional or semi-professional man, such as a dentist, pharmacist, or professor; he may be the owner or operator of a fairly successful small or medium-sized business (judged in relation to other businesses in the community), an executive below the top ranks, a highly skilled technician, or a contractor.

C Group -- "Middle Class"

This is the great middle class--the group to which most Americans think they belong (although only about half of them do)--comprising about 52 out of every 100 families in a community. Included is a wide range of people all along the economic scale from those not quite in the B group to those barely out of the D group. Like the A's and B's, the C's have all the necessities and some or even all the comforts of life available in their community. Unlike the A and B groups, however, the C's have few, if any, luxuries and may, in some cases, lack most of the tangible comforts connoted in the local standard of living scale.

In your community the bulk of the C group may be found in the following occupational categories: skilled and semi-skilled mechanical and production workers; experienced clerical employees and retail sales people; government employees--federal, state, county, and municipal; owners or operators of small businesses with limited sales volume (as compared with other businesses in the community).

D Group -- "Poor"

Almost a third of the families in any community--32 out of every 100--fall into the D group, the poor people. No one in the D group has all, though a few may have some, of the items which are considered necessary to an acceptable standard of living in the community.

APPENDIX C: THE ROPER ORGANIZATION, INC.: A SUMMARY OF SAMPLING PROCEDURES AND TYPICAL DEMOGRAPHICS

A. SAMPLE DESIGN

The sample interviewed currently is a representative sample of the population of the Continental United States, age 18 and up--exclusive of institutionalized segments of the population (Army camps, nursing homes, prisons, etc.).

The sampling methodology employed is a multistage, stratified probability sample of interviewing locations.

At the first selection stage, 100 counties are selected at random proportionate to population after all the counties in the nation have been stratified by population size within geographic region. At the second stage, cities and towns within the sample counties are drawn at random proportionate to population. Where block statistics are available, blocks are drawn within the cities and towns at random proportionate to population. Where no block statistics are available, blocks or rural route segments are drawn at random.

A specified method of proceeding from the starting household was prescribed at the block (or route) level. Quotas for sex and age levels of respondents, as well as for employed women, were imposed in order to insure proper representation of each group in the sample. In addition, hours were restricted for interviewing men (after 5:00 on weekdays and weekends) in order to obtain proper representation for employment.

A validation is made by telephone of all interviewers' work by an outside organization.

ECONOMIC LEVEL

(A) (A-) Group: Large one-family houses, 8 or more rooms, usually with garage for one and frequently two cars. Usually two or more bathrooms.
Executives and successful professional people.
90 to 95% own one or more automobiles (in the Far West and some parts of the Mid-West practically 100%).

(B+) (B) (B-) Group: Mainly moderate size one-family houses, some of the best two family and duplex homes, moderately expensive apartments.
Average professional people and the bulk of the average or better paid white collar jobs. A few highly paid skilled mechanics and craftsmen. Successful retail store owners.
60 to 80% own one, a few own two older or less expensive cars.

(C+) (C) (C-) Group: Small one-family houses, fairly well kept, many two-family houses and older,cheaper apartments.
Skilled workers in both trades and factories, police and firemen in many cities, truck drivers and poorly paid white collar jobs. Small retail store managers and owners.
40 to 70% own one car.

(D+) (D) Group: Run down one-family houses, poor two-family houses and tenements.
Unskilled labor, unemployed, janitors, and many of the unskilled and poorly paid factory workers. Usually includes all or most of the negro sections.
20 to 40% - on the west coast about 50% own a car but frequently an old one 6 to 10 years old.

(N) Group: Negro.

APPENDIX D: SOURCES OF MARGINAL DISTRIBUTIONS FOR SOME OF THE QUESTIONS CITED IN THIS INDEX.

Information on marginal distributions of responses to some of the questions in this index may be found in: (1) the monthly Gallup Opinion Index (formerly, the Gallup Political Index); (2) the three volume work by George H. Gallup, The Gallup Poll: Public Opinion, 1935-1972 (New York: Random House, 1972); and (3) "The Polls," a regular section of Public Opinion Quarterly, edited by Hazel Erskine. In the remaining cases, the marginals can be purchased from the Roper Public Opinion Research Center, Williamstown, Massachusetts.

"The Polls" has been a regular feature of Public Opinion Quarterly since 1961. In each issue of ~~the~~ POQ, "The Polls" presents both current and past opinion survey data on a particular topic or set of related topics. The researcher who uses "The Polls" will find the name of the survey organization, the date of the survey, the exact question wording, and the marginal distributions of responses related to that question.

Following is the list of subjects treated in "The Polls" since 1961. Since the subject designations used in this index (based on the Roper Center indexing system) and those used in "The Polls" frequently differ, the entries in the following "Polls" list have been cross indexed to major category headings (except for Practical Politics, in which minor categories are also given) in the Roper Center system which is used in this book.
